This book definitely has scenes that are not for anyone under the age of 17 or 18. However, the dominant subject matter was not the sex and that's what I find most refreshing about 'Zero at the Bone' by Jane Seville. She's able to describe these two characters with the efficiency that I found endearing and heart-wrenching.

And zero at the bone. This is another of Dickinson's poems presenting the point of view of a child, but the speaker is now an adult looking back. Can we determine whether the "child" is a boy or a girl? In one variant of the poem "child," in stanza 3, reads "boy." Could a girl also be barefoot outside?
